Excerpt from The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star, Vol. 83: September 29, 1921. Turning now to Genesis 1: 27, we find there the plain historical statement that man was created in the image of God. It is repeated again in the same verse, and though the language used in the second instance is not identical with that first employed, the substance of the different statements is identical. A repetition of this kind in a historical record can scarcely occur without there being some special significance attached to it. The Scriptures nowhere enters into a formal and exhaustive statement or exposition of the principles of revealed religion according to the models established for modern theses. On the contrary, Isaiah has informed us that the instructions of the Almighty to His children on earth have been communicated by giving precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little (isa. 28: This text thus merely calls attention to a truth that is obvious to every student of the Biblical Scriptures. Therefore, an essential rule that must...
