Bigaud, the much-admired French painter, was as much esteemed for his ready wit as for his talents as an artist. Though sought after by all as a portrait-painter, he was always unwilling to employ his pencil in the service of the ladies of the court---For, said he, if I paint real likenesses, they are always diasatisiied, and, were I to paint them all handsome, how few of their portraits would bear a reseinblaneel To one lady in particular, who, whilst she...
