Facts, however care fully recorded, must be subsequently scrutinized, compared, and classified, before any general conclusions can be derived from them, relative to the arrangements of the material universe. The Chaldeans, by confining their attention to the mere occurrence Of phenomena, were unable to arrive at general views of the celestial motions; the philosophers of the Grecian schools, on the other hand, long wasted their transcendent talents in groundless speculations, which were equally ineffectual in producing any permanent in?uence on the progress of Astronomy.
