Excerpt from The London Medical Gazette, Vol. 1: Being a Weekly Journal of Medicine and the Collateral Sciences; For the Session 1839-40 Preliminary remarks respecting passive aneurism and diseases of the auricles. - Before entering, however, on the particulars of any of those topics relating to cardiac diagnosis, it is necessary, or at least convenient, that I should offer some preliminary observations, in order to explain why, in my enumeration of the species of heart disease that require each for itself a distinct account of its diagnostic symptoms, I pass over some topics much enlarged upon by preceding writers, and considered apparently of great importance. The topics I refer to are the varieties observed in morbus cordis, arising out of differences in different instances, in the distribution of the hypertrophy and enlargement; that condition being sometimes, it has been held, altogether wanting, but in most cases present, though not always equally divided between the sides and cavities. And in the first place, let me guard myself against the suspicion of an unworthy desire to depreciate the meritorious...
