He could not play well at ball or hoop, yet he was the first boy in the school. His mother had taught him the hard lessons, and explained all the hard words to him; so that while other boys were at play, or doing mischief, he was learning something useful from his mother. One day his father and mother died, and he and a little sister had to go and live with an aunt, a great distance from the school. So the little boy thought, as he could not go to school, he would read all the books he could get, and teach his little sister all that he knew, and all that his good mother had taught him about God and the heavenly country where their father and mother had gone. And, O, how delighted he was to teach his sister! How joyfully he would get up at six o'clock in the morning, and would tie on her little black bonnet, and white pinafore and shawl! Then he would brush her tiny shoes, until they were very black, and would put on his straw hat, and away they would go over the hills together. At nine o'clock, he would teach her to read; then he taught her to write and to spell. He showed her how to make figures, and work sums on her slate, and her aunt taught her to sew. One day, when they were out...
