Excerpt from The Maccabaeae, Vol. 5: July, 1903 The first attack upon the problem, however, was made without resort to dialectics. The opportunist character of Jewish reform never presented so attractive an aspect as when it put the Jewish education of women upon its banner. Israel without a doubt had arrived at the juncture when women should have participated in his public activities. The principle was unexceptionable, but its application was disappointing. The confirmation service for girls, in which the principle embodied itself, and which was to be the tower of female education, fell far short of fulfilling the hopes it had aroused. Like much of the work attempted by the reformers it will have to be done over again by another generation. It was sterile, ineffectual. It failed to stimulate the Jewish development of women, because it was an assertion of the principle of female education in theory only. In practice it put up with a minimum of superficial knowledge and an apology for Jewish training. With those outside of the reform party, it had the effect of throwing discredit upon the principle of female education, for to subscribe to a principle that seemed perforce to involve the introduction of a custom of the Gentiles, looked dangerously like dalliance with reform. At best, a very small fraction of Jewish womanhood was prepared, in the first half of the Nineteenth Century, to lend itself to educational experiments. The vast majority of Jews lived in countries still untouched by the new education, whether of men or of women. When the changed spirit at last penetrated to Russia and the rest of Eastern Europe, the awakening was too abrupt for development to run along normal...
