Johnny walked off campus without telling anyone where he was headed; not his coach, fiancée, family or friends. Seven years later, and he hadn't looked back. His new life was full of cons and scraping to get by, but he didn't regret it. He kept himself at arm's length with everyone. One-night-stands and three-night-stands, all served as diversions for Johnny. But now he stood, naked in the mirror, wondering what it all meant? Would his life continue like this or would he ever settle down? He didn't want to be alone forever, but he sure as hell wasn't going to assume some boring old life and wait to die. Johnny was good at conning people. He enjoyed it way more than he should, but the big score had eluded him. He eventually wanted a shack on the beach with plenty of money and few bills, but without that big score, he knew he would always feel the itch. He needed to quit all this petty shit. The score tomorrow would be fun, though. He was curious to see if Delilah could pull it off. Johnny liked her, a lot. Her crooked smile tugged at his heart, and that mop of unruly hair that framed her face was like a cloud of black smoke that followed her around. It was soft and billowy and he wanted to touch it. He wanted her. If he played his cards right, he could have it all. Six Months Earlier. For Bradley Thatcher, Sunday mornings in New York meant two things: lounging with the Sunday Times while enjoying a fresh cup of java, and getting the girl from the...
