In the north of South America there is a brief break in the zenithal rainfall, the so-called veranito de San Juan, which usually takes place at the end of June, and represents the northern extension of the solstitial dry season of equatorial regions. It is very difficult to estimate the region where this dry St. John's summer reduces the rainfall to less than 100 mm. (4 inches), and the only records giving a smaller amount are those of Bogota. The region of lower rainfall over the Llanos, and including the Bogotan plateau, must therefore be looked upon as a diagrammatic expression of the occurrence of the dry period, and not as a perfectly definite area. African Area. --In Africa hardly any rain falls south of the equator, except on the coastal regions north of Zanzibar and in Madagascar. Madagascar presents a great contrast as regards the rainfall in east and west at this season. The southeast trades bring abundant rains to the east coast, while the west is very dry. At Tamatave 310 mm. (12.2 inches) fall, at Antananarivo only 8 mm. (0.3 inch), and at Mayunga, on the west coast, there is no rain at all. North of the equator Africa really lies in the western section of the great Old World summer low-pressure area, and in the west there are characteristic heavy monsoon rains, and a heavy precipitation probably occurs over the Southern Central Sudan. Malay-Australian Area. --South of the equator the rainfall...
