We must begin with the sympathy, and then--and then only--feel at liberty to perform the divine and blessed task of helping our brother. Secondly, there comes the practical action of beneficence; and here our subject naturally ramifies under the different heads under which I have classed these addresses. Benevolence, true charity, must indeed begin at home. On the universal law of benevolence, we must place the natural extract the following passage from his brilliant articles, as touching to my mind the very nadir of morals, and embodying as nearly as possible all that I think to be most false, debasing, and perilous in the speculations of this now paramount school: -- On le voit la doctrine de l evolution telle que l entendent MM. Darwin et Spencer, remplace l obligation morale du spiritualisme par une sorte d obligation...
