W, Inge, of Alabama, on the Relation of Parties to the Mexican War The policy and objects of the antagonistic party I shall endeavor to unfold in the course of my remarks. The history of parties, in connection with the Mexican war, in its origin, progress, and termination, forms a curious chapter in American politics. I shall examine the relation of parties to this great question, with a view of presenting the conduct of each to the impartial judgment of the people; and in my comments upon the course of that party opposed to the present Administration, I desire to be understood as limiting their application to politicians by trade. The great body of the American people, however known by party appellations, and divided by differences of opinion, are moved by the same impulses of patriotism when the national honor is involved. The history of Texas, its revolution, and subsequent annexation to the American confederacy, is so familiarly known to the world, as to relieve me from minute detail. I shall advert only to the prominent events upon which my argument rests. Prior to the year 1834, Texas was an independent State of the Mexican confederacy, under the Constitution of 1824, having similar relations to the Federal Government and her sister States, which exist between the States and Federal Government of our own political system. Santa Anna, at the head of an army of mercenaries, subverted the Constitution of 1824; abolished the sovereignty of the States, and erected upon the ruins of the republic, a central military despotism. The people of Texas remonstrated against the lawless proceedings of the despot,...
