Excerpt: .of the adult male there is an arrangement closely resembling the poison-fang of a Viper--a sharp horny spur perforated by a minute canal, and connected with a gland in the back of the thigh. There are rudimentary evidences of a similar spur in the young female, which, however, disappear with puberty. A case of this spur being used as a weapon and producing effects of local poisoning has been reported. These animals have been proved to lay eggs. The Echidna, or spiny Anteater, a native of New Guinea, Tasmania, and Australia, is edentulous, and has no horny plates in its mouth; its calcaneal spur and gland are smaller than those of Ornithorhynchus. Ornithorhynchus, also a najtive of Australia, possesses in early life twelve calcified teeth of a multituberculate type; these teeth are erupted and used, but are shed early, which accounts for the fact thaTTheir existence was not recognised until comparatively recently. Underneath these teeth the beak is armed with horny plates, which are ridged and tuberculated, and serve the animal as teeth throughout the greater part of its life. The dentine is abundantly supplied with interglobular spaces. The presence of large, irregular lacunae has led Tomes to suggest that these teeth are a degeneration from some earlier and more complete form of tooth. Metatheria The marsupial animals, which were once widely distributed over the surface of the globe, are at present confined to the continent of Australia, which they practically monopolize, and some...
