H., June 7, 1855 There are some truths so plain, and so readily assented to, that they are little better than falsehoods in respect to their practical influence. To get them honestly doubted is perhaps the first step to getting them efficiently believed. Among these is the importance of religion to a nation; a truth which secures with about equal readiness our assent and our indifference. To hear it disputed might excite our indignation and sorrow; to hear it affirmed moves only our thoughtless acquiescence. When in the reign of terror, the French nation, so far as their act could do it, deposed God, and abolished public worship, and religious days and usages, the pious instincts of the world were shocked at the monstrous idea of a nation without a church, a people without faith. It was perhaps a happy thing for Christendom, that one nation should substitute antipathy to religion for indifference to it, and convert into visible opposition and practical atheism, what is commonly only latent and unconscious distaste for piety. It alarmed other nations into self-examination, and animated the theological studies and religious activity of the Protestant world. It is fortunate that from time to time, other providential circumstances draw attention to national religion, and awaken our minds to the importance of understanding the religious life of whole peoples. Until the recent war with Russia, the English nation were interested in nothing so much as in studying the question of their relations as a people to Christianity, and to Christian institutions....
