This book is aimed at the common reader minimally acclimated with the Critique of Political Economy of the German philosopher Karl Marx. The book is an interview with the German philosopher and historian Robert Kurz. The interview was conducted by Graziela Wolfart and Patricia Fachin. The German philosopher starts from the observation that the current global crisis is not about a cyclical crisis from which capitalism will recover further, but it is actually a reflection of the inner economic barrier of capitalism - According to Kurz, the internal barrier of valorization of the value and the beginning of the external ecological barrier was reached. Thus, in the authors thesis, defended in his works and in this interview reproduced and annotated here, capitalism has nowhere to expand. For to him, the substance of capital (value) has lost substance. Kurz, anchored in Karl Marx, says that the substance of value is abstract labor. And this with the microelectronics revolution started in 1980, has lost its aspect of living labor - the abstract work of human wage earners; Was and is being continually replaced by the dead labor of the machines. In this way, the value valorisation circuit, that is, transformation from abstract to value-added work, is not closed. The world economy, which is increasingly based on an illusion of financially driven growth, is actually involved in the collapse of mortgage credit. Catalyst of a process of devaluation of all financial capital. And the apparent exit of appeal to the state will not result in anything, because the state can not stop the devaluation, but only manage it. Or in the case of Brazil 2016, adopt increasingly restrictive and repressive measures, such as...
