Excerpt: . . . have the manhood to go and rescue Victor from the terrible danger you have helped to place him in, I will go myself. I will go and tell him that his poor mother was the victim of excessive religious enthusiasm and an unbalanced believer in your barbaric teachings. I will tell him that her last words were suggested by such miserable fanatics as you are, and, as the doctor walked out, the priest said piously: God have mercy on your soul! Pray for your own soul--mine is in no danger, were the doctor's last words as he left the presbytery. Arrived at his home, he informed his wife and daughter that he was going to Nicolet at once. Always a hard driver, still never before had the old doctor driven his horse so fast as while going to Nicolet that day; and when he arrived at the college the harness could hardly be seen so thick was the foam on his faithful animal. After ringing two or three times in quick succession, the door of the college was opened by a sleepy doorkeeper, who asked the doctor to step into the parlor. I want to see Victor Dorion right away, said the doctor, but he was informed that he would have to see the director first and from him obtain permission. Well, tell the director that I want to see him at once. After waiting quite a while, the director came in, and...
