Its aim is not to describe practical details of construction nor of the mechanical work involved in the erection of an apparatus. These in the opinion of the Author, can only be learnt properly by handling the things themselves. Considerable experience of this, as well as of several other important branches of engineering, has convinced the Author that apparent discrepancies between theory and practice are here both more important and more difficult fully to account for than is the case in most other branches. A full comprehension of the limitations within which theory is applicable is therefore almost as necessary to a thorough understanding of the subject as knowledge of the principles themselves. There is a marked tendency, even in the best modern practice, to accept blindly the dicta of experimental and theoretical science as directly applicable to the solution of problems in heating and ventilation without any inquiry as to how far the conditions of practical work warrant this implicit faith. The fact that the validity of some of these applications has not more often been called in question is probably due to the extraordinary difficulty of making exact practical tests to verify or refute it. A critical examination of the applicability of scientific principles to each part of this subject, made in the light of...
