Excerpt: . . . disease is to remain perfectly passive in mind when first coming under treatment. A treatment that begins by endeavouring to secure a patients confidence is a humbugging affair; but a treatment that ends by the establishment of a patients faith by relief of his sufferings is one that aims at a natural sequence of events. The best thing a doctor can do to a patient who enters his study in a querulous and suspecting frame of mind, both for his own and his patients benefit, is to show them the hall-door, or, as the French would say, donner la clef des eramps. A seriousness and determination to get cured is almost as necessary as an equally serious determination on the doctors part to effect a cure. In the complaints of women, but particularly in uterine cancers, the need for complete passiveness of mind in the...
