Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Richard (Dick) Young was a married, father of one at the time, working at Minneapolis Moline, which had become a defense plant, supporting the WWII effort, when he entered his service time. He was trained in the armor division of the US Army at Ft. Knox, Kentucky and arrived in the war zone at Le Havre, France after extensive training on various tanks. He became a tank commander after entering Germany. While serving in war is not pleasant, Dick had one experience that forever stood out in his mind. He was in the lead tank as a commander, in a parade, where he was able to salute General Patton when Nuremberg was liberated. He often proudly displayed a photo of that parade, which is included in this book. Dick was a young man of 27 years, when he returned to his family at the end of the war. He was of German heritage, and as a young teenager, learned from his father about the properties of metal and what could be made, in the small family workshop using a metal turning lathe. Those experiences early in his life, shaped him as he became a machinist and tool and die maker. Along with his two brothers, they opened a small repair shop in their hometown of Grand Forks, North Dakota. They had to put equipment into storage and close the repair shop at the outbreak of the Korean War when Dick and one brother were shipped to Korea. Upon returning from that conflict, Dick and his brother found other employment, but were eventually encouraged to work at a contract manufacturing shop. Andrew Freeman, a local businessman and inventor sought the help of Dick...
