Forgotten Books. Paperback. Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. 24 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 0.1in. Excerpt from Diseases and Parasites of Poultry Symptoms - There are no prominent symptoms by which the disease can be diagnosed during life, and it is only by the examination of the internal organs after death that the trouble is recognized. The disease runs a chronic course, and birds do not show signs of illness until just before death, when the pathological changes are so far advanced as to preclude medicinal treatment. These changes are to be observed in the liver and caeca. The caeca are two elongated blind pouches at the lower end of the small intestines. In the normal fowl they are of uniform diameter throughout, the walls thin and the mucous membrane pale; they are filled with a rather dry, greenish excrement. In entero-hepatitis one or both caeca have their walls greatly thickened either throughout or in spots. The mucous membrane is deeply reddened and eroded and from this inflamed surface there is poured into the caeca a quantity of cross material or exudate more or less tinted with blood. The liver also shows marked alterations. It is enlarged and darkened, due to engorgement with blood, and scattered over its surface are round spots, sometimes whitish or again with yellowish tint. These spots are so distinct that no one can fail to recognize them. Prevention - Isolation of the sick and disinfection of the houses occupied by the healthy. Particularly is it important to guard the young birds which are more susceptible to the contagion. It will therefore be best where the disease has been prevalent to remove the young to new quarters, where the trouble has never before existed rather than trust to the...
