Appearances of Christ. Final scene of glory. The Chorus, twenty in number, step out half from each side of the broad stage in front of the Theatre proper. They advance slowly till the two leaders meet; then they turn round and face the audience in a long line. They are all in the same long robes of various colours, reaching down to their feet. The Head or Foreman, a fine man with a black beard, addresses the audience, explanatory of what is to follow then they all sing a melodious chant and at last draw back into two semi-circles, one on each Side of the Theatre and as the curtain rises for the Tableaux, one of their number sings an air exhibiting the motif, as the curtain falls, they all again advance to the front, catching up the air and chanting the appropriate warnings and exhortations this over, they all file out, and the real scene begins. This is generally acted inside the covered Theatre, but in the crowded scenes, the greater part of the...
