I particularly like the finding that learning about motivation and identifying values seemed more significant to the coachee s than setting goals. These are of course related, but the emphasis is important and thought provoking. This also reflects well on the practical side of the research - the third dimension that is not always visible on paper, the research itself- in that work is well designed and the coaching demonstrates a keen understanding of process and challenge. In that three dimensional perspective, this is a pleasing piece of work with much merit to it, and a good synthesis of the learning that we would have expected to take place over the Masters course. The data collection and findings are...
