Depicting the protagonist's development from a poor orphan girl to a young governess who 'yearns for true liberty' (Gilbert and Gubar 347), Brontë evokes a utopian ideal of a strong-minded heroine who defies social customs by marrying her master, Edward Fairfax Rochester. When pondering over Brontë's comment to her publisher in 1848, '[t]he standard hero[e]s and heroines of novels are personages in whom I could never . . . take an interest, believe to be natural or wish to imitate: were I obliged to copy these characters, I would simply not write at all' (qtd. in Brennan 16), one can draw conclusions about Brontë's intention to reward her heroine...
