Excerpt from Report of the Porto Rico Agricultural Experiment Station, 1918 The war has brought the people of Porto Rico to a realization of the needs of the island in improved methods and increased production in agriculture. The fear of isolation by submarine activities emphasized the importance of increasing food production by planting vacant lands and by interplanting food crops with the staple crops of the island. Importation of foodstuffs had become so general and their home production so limited that the threatened possibility of being cut off from sources of food supply disclosed the fact that a land of perpetual summer and a continuous growing season might be brought to face the problem of want and possibly starvation. This made the people of the island willing not only to plant and cultivate more land, but to seek new crops and to study the latest methods of improving yields and increasing profits. Through it all the results of the station experiments have been studied and applied to a greater extent than ever before. Greater progress has been made in agriculture than in any other year of the island's history. Crops heretofore neglected have been taken up, methods formerly ignored have been applied, and unused lands and idle people have been employed in production to a greater extent than ever before.
