Excerpt from Some Early Jewish Catechisms: An Address Delivered in the Course of Public Lectures at the Jewish Theological Seminary, New York, March 25, 1909 The book itself begins with the first conversation between the teacher and his pupil. The pupil greets the teacher on entering, and being asked who he was, he says that he is a Jew born; in the image of God. The discussion at once turns on the point of the purpose of existence. The pupil declares that he was born to serve God without the expectation of any reward, although the reward is sure to come in the next world. To the rabbi's question as to the means by which we might expect to inherit the world to come, the pupil is made to declare the three cardinal principles of religion - faith in God, trust and love. In describing the principle of faith, the youth is led to enumerate the thirteen creeds of Maimonides, being frequently interrupted by the teacher, thereby eliciting further explanation and elaboration. Trust in God is the next point discussed, which is made to include divine providence, God's kindness to all creatures, and, as a corollary, the doctrine of prayer. Love of God and love of all his creatures are then made the basis for the whole Law. There are seven deadly sins which men must shun - idleness, pride, gluttony, sensuality, anger, stinginess and jealousy, all of which have their corresponding virtues. After enumerating several other sins that are hateful to God and summarizing the whole system as laid down, the teacher asks the pupil what difference there is in the knowl...
