Excerpt from The City of Nottingham: Past, Present and Future; Its Special Advantages as a Commercial Centre and as a Place of Residence But it is as a commercial centre—that Nottingham has the greatest practical importance and interest. Situated in the very middle of England, and also in the centre of one of the most important coalfields in the county (having several large collieries within the city boundaries), with an ironstone area a few miles away, with economising haulage, and with all public services - gas, electricity, water, trams - municipally controlled and managed on soundly successful commercial lines, it is a fortunate place of abode for the manufacturer and trader. The excellent railway communication with London makes it an eligible place of residence for families of refinement. The health record is excellent, and the Public Health service has a high reputation for efficiency among experts qualified to judge. Not many manufacturing places have a lower death-rate. The supply of labour, both male and female, is abundant and well-trained, technical schools and a school of art doing excellent work for employers in preparing...
