By whatever term we think proper to distinguish the knowledge of the properties of space and number, these properties, as well as the subject matter of them, must ever remain unchanged. It is true that properties, before unknown, may in the progress of the science be made known, and the sphere of science be thus enlarged; but the subject matter must ever be the same. In mathematics, we contemplate the properties of that being, (if I may so express myself,) which not only can undergo no change, but in which no change is conceivable, and which therefore is susceptible of the utmost exactness of definition. Nothing that we can form any idea of is like it, and as we cannot by any means conceive the idea of...
