In these instances the lethal factor is a lack of chlorophyll which is not fatal if inherited from a single parent because the deficiency is supplied by a gene for chlorophyll from the other parent, but when the lack comes from both parents it produces a seedling unable to survive. Recently G. H. Shull has demonstrated the existence of two balanced recessive lethal factors in one pair of the fourteen chromosomes in Oenothera, one pair producing a lethal effect in the zygote, the other pair destroying the gametes. This fact explains many of the hitherto confusing ratios obtained in breeding this classical plant. Such lethal factors modify the expected Mendelian ratios and greatly complicate the study of genetics, but they do not destroy its fundamental principles, indeed when properly understood they furnish one of the strongest proofs of the...
