Excerpt from Oversight Review of Research Laboratory Programs at the National Institute of Standards and Technology: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Technology of the Committee on Science, U. S. House of Representatives, One Hundred Fourth Congress, Second Session, June 25, 1996 We work With industry, law enforcement, and security officials to help them in their efforts to develop sound cryptographic techniques that balance these interests. Many of the techniques that we have developed have been voluntarily adopted by private sector organizations. An example is the Data Encryption Standard, which is based on a commercially developed technique and which long ago became a voluntary industry standard for protecting computer information. As a leader in computer security for the federal government, we are often asked by governmental organizations of other countries to participate in joint projects. We are currently cooperating with Canada, France, the UK, Germany, and the Netherlands to develop common evaluation criteria for computer security products and systems. This cooperative approach is expected to pay off for all participants. One uniform, internationally accepted method for evaluating computer security products would lower costs for producers, increase the availability of products for users, and help to broaden the global market for us.
