Soapy outlined the modus operandi. Jake was to sit near the door of the coach, facing Soapy, so as to observe the latter's signals. If anything went wrong, both would be prepared Soapy was to do the talking. When the train pulled into the depot, both entered the rear coach.-Soapy immediately took a seat beside the prospective victim, but after holding conversation with him for a short time signalled to Jake that it was no go. The train was stopping at another town and Soapy and Jake got off. Denver was only a few miles away and Soapy proposed that they walk into the city. Sleepy Jake agreed and the two were soon lost to sight down the track. Soapy was explaining to Jake why the mine-owner had turned down the proposition when two masked men suddenly stepped in front of them from behind an embankment. The command, hands up, was augmented by a pair of revolvers thrust into the faces of the tiwalkers. Sleepy Jake's belt was loosened and nearly three thousand dollars taken from several inside pockets of his shirt. Soapy was also relieved of what little cash he had. The latter act, however, was only a ruse to deceive Sleepy. Both highwaymen were confederates of Soapy. He had swindled a swindler. That was one of the last of Soapy's big get-aways during his reign of crime in Colorado. His lawlessness finally palled...
