Forgotten Books, United States, 2016. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from The Future of Science in America: An Address Delivered on Founder s Day; February 1, 1917 Most men, when they speak of science today, have in mind technical or applied science. In their minds they see America manufacturing her own dyes, supplying her own nitrates, and what not. This is all very well, but the problem involved in these instances lies not so much in the realm of science as in that of political economy or business finance. Doing what others have done before us does not constitute scientific activity; science is essentially creative. When we are doing what others have not done, when Germany or France or any other country begins to introduce processes which were originated and developed in America, then, and only then, can it be said that we have attained a position in science commensurate with our position as a nation. But before this happy condition can be brought about, not merely technical science but science itself, the knowledge of the laws of nature, must be developed in America to a point in advance of that of other nations. Much confusion has arisen from a lack of understanding of the true meaning of the terms pure science and technical or applied science. Actually there is no distinction between them save one of degree. Applied science necessarily deals with that phase of science whose results are more or less immediately applicable to the needs of man; pure science is concerned with the discovery of new and fundamental relationships among the complex phenomena of nature in order that man's dominion over nature may be extended. The pure science of today serves as the foundation upon...
