Excerpt from Louisiana Conservationist, Vol. 7: April, 1955 Salt water intrusion of the coastal marshes is an other factor of considerable importance. Excessive salt water intrusion results in fresh and estuarine waters becoming more saline and marine with ac accompanying environmental changes - one type of vegetation will be replaced by another, while one population of animals may be replaced by another or suffer a marked decrease in numbers. Generally speaking, such changes in our marshes are deiri mental to our wildlife, especially waterfowl and fur bearers. Navigation channels and canals associated with the Gulf of Mexico have enhanced salt water intru sion in south Louisiana. Meanwhile, above this area diversion of waters from their natural drainage routes by ?ood control, drainage, irrigation, and land reclamation projects, has reduced the volume of incoming fresh waters over wide areas. Evidence indicates that the resulting stabilization of these waters has in turn resulted in many of these bodies of water becoming choked with water hyacinths and other noxious plants. In southwest Louisiana where the demands are high for sweet or fresh water for irrigation of the rice crops, salt water intrusion has become a problem of great proportions. Coastal shallow fresh marshes are becoming dry; apparently this may be attributed to drainage and the absence of incoming Water due to losses to irrigation and drought conditions. Considerable benefits may be attributed to the rice lands, however, as feeding grounds for the wintering waterfowl.
