To offer some other considerations which should dissuade men from using Tobacco. 6. To indicate the methods of promoting a cure of the Tobacco habit. I. Medicinal Properties. What are the medicinal powers of Tobacco? This question is easily answered, as none of its properties are obscure. On every system not accustomed to its use, they declare themselves as the sin of Sodom. Neither has there ever been any dispute among medical men, as to what those medicinal properties are. Whatever medical authority we open, we find that Tobacco has certain diuretic powers attributed to it; that it is an emetic of great energy; that, in certain circumstances, it acts as a cathartic; but that its most prominent and powerful quality is the narcotic. The general effect of narcotics is to allay excitement and nervous irritation, to quiet restlessness, to diminish sensibility, relieve pain, and promote sleep. These effects are produced only by small doses. In excessive doses, their effects are stupor, convulsions, prostration, and death. Of all narcotics known, not more than one can vie with Tobacco for deadly power, when used under circumstances which favor its action. Dr. Chapman, of Philadelphia, has described Tobacco under the head of emetics; though he remarks that it has other properties, which give it as strong a claim to a different location in the materia medica. He is perfectly right in this arrangement. Even the nauseousness alone of Tobacco would give it a place among emetics. But Tobacco has higher claims to the office of an emetic...
