Navy began the task of assigning women to sea-duty on non-combatant ships other than hospital or transport ships. While the presence of women on Navy ships is not expected to alter normal operations, there are design features of ships and shipboard equipment which may require modification for use by females. The most obvious, of course, involve considerations of sleeping quarters, and similar ship features. In addition, though, equipment and systems may require modification if they are to be used extensively by women. Most naval shipboard safety and emergency escape equipment currently in use was designed for the 5th to 95th percentile male with respect to height, weight, and physical strength. Approximately 25 percent of the female population is smaller, lighter, and weaker than the 5th percentile male. In view of these differences, the adequacy of critical equipment should be reassessed as during an emergency, survival could depend upon the ability of women to operate the equipment successfully.
