It is my object to attract attention to these unused powers so as to inaugurate a new path of development. This path is the educational one. The educational powers of the player piano embody a principle capable of rich development, as wonderful in its way as that of the phonograph and, if possible, even more interesting. The present-day phonograph and player piano have provided the world with part of the sheer and immense entertainment afforded by music but as no systematic scheme of knowledge or culture accompanies such experience, only fugitive and disconnected impressions result. The catalogues of the phonograph and piano-player omit seven-tenths of all the world s music inheritance and have no means for impressing musical knowledge and musical experience upon the memory. Such knowledge can not be acquired without symbols. It must be obvious that...
