Not illustrated. 1888 Excerpt: . many people expected that his Imperial Majesty would be attired in flowing robes, yellow papouches, a tremendous turban and golden girdle, with a huge crooked cimeter in one hand and a jewelled narghile in the other, his hookah-bearer and body-executioner in close attendance upon him; and that they were rather astonished to behold a grave, portly, pale, intellectuallooking middle-aged gentleman, dressed in a dark blue frock-coat and trousers, relieved by a moderate quantity of gold embroidery and one or two crachatx comme tout le month, his head covered by a plain red fez, his hands exquisitely gloved, his whole appearance that of an amiable, refined, and thoughtful European. I am not quite sure that a large percentage of the gemUthlichen Wiener did not anticipate that he would be black. I am very certain that they were quite taken aback upon seeing that he was not even yellow. At Schftnbrunn the Archdukes received him, after which, being extremely fatigued, he retired to his private apartments. The so-called Napoleon suite had been prepared for him, the Chinese saloon being for the nonce converted into a reception-room, and the Indian chamber into a bedroom; besides these, a splendid audience chamber, library, writing-room, bath-room, etc., had been affected to the special use of the Sultan. The heir-apparent aud the other members of the Imperial family occupied a large suite of rooms on the ground floor of the palace, approached by the Chapel Court. These apartments had been newly decorated...
