Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: . . . as a preliminary; so that the English standard is just half that of New York. Upon the continent of Europe the same general system prevails, save that dental education in most countries is conducted in the universities, forming a part of the medical course. France, however, has distinct dental schools, which are not engrafted upon so-called hospitals, as in England, and which in some respects approach the American colleges in methods. Like nearly or quite all schools outside America, however, they are more thorough in the theoretical than in the practical work done. There are in France five dental schools at present, three of them being in Paris, and of these preeminence should probably be given to the Ecole Dentaire de Paris and the Ecole Odontotechnique. As in England, dentistry is considered as a branch of medicine, and the qualification for matriculation is obtained by examination at the Sorbonne, University of Paris, No foreign equivalent is accepted in lieu of this. There are two examinations, the one written and the other oral. The written is to determine the possession of a thorough knowledge of the French language, and consists in translating into French the writings of some standard author from the Latin, German, English, Italian, or Spanish languages. The oral examination in France embraces the following subjects: French literature and grammar, and the elements of arithmetic, algebra, geometry, physics, chemistry, geology, zoology, and botany. The course in the dental schools is nominally three years of nine...
