Excerpt from Address Before the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Their Annual Commencement: March 14th, 1867 For it is not with the learned professions - using that phrase in its now venerable significance - as it is with the other vocations which by universal experience are con ceded to involve a technical knowledge and skill wholly beyond the reach of any but their life-long apprentices. The products of the useful arts, the workmanship of the trades, nay, to a certain extent even the fruits of the studio, are things which appeal to the senses and the common udgment of men; their utility, in some sense, is obvious; their relative merit, measurable. Nobody, unless driven by distress, undertakes to be his own car penter or plumber; his own watch-maker or engine builder, his own optician, or practical chemist, or makes his own logarithms and rules of navigation. And those amateurs who hang up their own paintings or erect their own sculptures, or even build their own houses, commonly discover sooner by that process than any other, that both native genius and an exclusive devotion to the Fine Arts, are essential even to a tolerable success. People will not go to sea in ships built by any but professional ship builders, nor buy at any price textures or fabrics that come from any but experts at the business.
