Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: .held firmly, and in any case where they have failed to work satisfactorily, it will generally be found that the fault was in the caps, or the bad quality of the steel. Sheet cast steel from the best makers is by no means an inferior article for such cutters, if carefully worked and not overheated in tempering. What will answer for a saw will not do for cutters that have sharp edges, not that a saw is not better if made from fine steel, but the edges are more obtuse and not so liable to break. These thin knives were patented first by Godeau in France, subsequently by Gedge in England, and perhaps several times in America, so the plan is well patented, if that Js to be regarded as a recommendation. In sharpening these cutters, fine mill saw files of good quality can be used. As a rule it is an expensive plan to sharpen tempered steel tools with files, but in this case the material is so thin, and so little to file away, that when the time oi taking off and resetting is considered, there is a great saving of cost by sharpening with files. The edge must of course be finished with a stone to make it smooth. As remarked in the case of grinding planing knives, much time is lost in most shops by using fine grit stones. The grindstone should be considered an implement for cutting away metal, not making...
