The marked effect of different amounts of rain upon the yield and quantity Of crops is familiar to all in the everyday experience of farmers. It will be seen from these records that, owing to the difference in the texture of soils, even with the same amount of rainfall, soils retain very different amounts of water. As crops require very different conditions of water for their best development, this dif ference in the water content of soils very largely accounts for the peculiar adaptation of certain soils -to certain classes of crops. A good truck soil in a favorable season will contain about 5 per cent, or one twentieth of its weight, of water; and grass land, on the other hand, should contain 20 per cent, or one-fifth of its weight, of water; These are characteristic differences due to the peculiar texture of these lands and their relation to water. The actual amount of water contained in the soil determines the character of the season, the actual amount of rainfall being no reliable measure of this. These records show the actual conditions of moisture available to plants in these soils. It is not possible at present to draw reliable deductions from these records until more data is collected, and they are therefore given for the present with little comment.
