Excerpt: . and not one from St. James, was in fact of no moment, had he considered that the citations from St. Paul bore directly upon the point which the Reformers had in view to establish, whilst no citations from St. James would immediately have answered their purpose. For the doctrine which our Reformers had to establish in the Homily in question was simply this, that no human works of any kind were to encroach upon those all-sufficient merits, to which alone the justification of fallen man was to be attributed. The Archdea-con of Ely must therefore see much further than I can, to discover how this circumstance of Bishop Bull s appealing to St. James instead of St. Paul is deserving of especial remark; it strikes me as the most natural thing in the world, that the Bishop should have recourse to that authority...
