Excerpt from The Open Court, Vol. 26: October, 1912 An actual marriage of full value was accomplished by purchase. The woman, or at least the power over her, was the Object of the contract of sale. Marriage by violence, perhaps never carried on among the Babylonians, did not lead in the case of the Franks to a complete marriage. Peaceful neighborly relations led to a peaceful marriage agreement. With both peoples this was divided into two parts, into the legal act of betrothal and the nuptial ceremony. At the latter took place the actual transference Of the bride to her hus band. As wife she came under his control. If in these relations the woman was looked upon rather as the victim of an outside power than as a self-acting personality, the position of the widow who wished to remarry (and this was allowed both by Babylonians and Salians) was far better; she could engage herself according to her Own inclination. Although in both countries the husband s power was developed very differently yet in neither could it ever rise to the the power of life and death. The guardian rights (mum) of the husband met an impassable barrier when it came to the life of the woman.
