Paperback. Condition: New. 104 pages. Adam Wordsworth writes a comprehensive expos of the state-driven alienation of fathers from their children. While his initial motivation to write his book arose from his own experience of Family Court, he has successfully put passion aside and written a balanced and reasoned insight which argues the case for reform. There are many nuggets in this book, such as the belief among politicians that there is a womens vote to be courted but not a mens vote, and that this has led to a bias in favour of women in legislation. He quotes Edmund Burke: When leaders choose to make themselves bidders at an auction of popularity, their talents, in the construction of the state, will be no service. This is a good and informative read. - Ray Barry, Chair of Real Fathers For Justice With foreword by Thomas Moore. Family law is one of the most emotive and heavily contested areas of the legal system in the U. K. The basis of law today for couples with children who are going through a separation stems from The Children Act. The government, the courts and professionals within the legal system all herald the current arrangement as being as fair as it can be. Yet a series of high profile protests in recent years - buildings scaled, paintings defaced, marches through London - suggest that not all members of the public are happy with where the law lies. The End of Discrimination examines how the law has evolved in the U. K. from a piecemeal of common laws into the enshrining of particular values in statute. Then in assessing the arguments put forward for changing the law, it considers whether this is necessary, what it would look like in practice, whether it would work and, most importantly,...
