Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: .a sense, out of the world, particularly after a ferry was established at Granton, which took away the traffic, such as it was, that passed between the North and South Queensferries, and when mails and travellers were carried by rail, and in the absence, till lately, of any railway in the neighbourhood. Notwithstanding that the dignified ancient burgh thus became (what it was pretty much always) a sleepy little place, out of sight and almost out of mind, we could still have expected that such an important work as the Encyclopedia Britannica would have been more accurate in its description of it than to have said that it is beautifully situated on the brow of an acclivity rising from the margin of a Bay called St. Margaret s Hope. Had Inverkeithing been situated in some secluded nook on the coast of Japan, in place of within sight of Edinburgh, the bay on the edge of which it is built could not have been more incorrectly de scribed. St. Margaret s Hope is between one and two miles by land from Inverkeithing, and several miles by water, judging from where it is supposed to begin. It may be said to extend from somewhere above the North and South Queensferries to the west, as far as there is deep water with good anchorage. Thus the five or six quarantine hulks rode at anchor probably opposite Rosyth burying-ground, pretty close together, yet scattering, with room to swing with the...
