Excerpt from The Different Principles on Which the Chief Systems of Popular Representation Have Been Based in Ancient and Modern Times: A Prize Essay, Read in the Theatre, Oxford, June 20th, 1855 The moral greatness of political societies is not to be measured solely by the form of their institutions. Forms of polity are analogous to bodily organization; they owe all their force and expression to the soul which animates them, to the living spirit of the people. Considered apart from the soul, the body-politic is a lifeless corpse, and the study of it mere anatomy, - a matter of curious and necessary research, but subordinate to the sublimer aims of political philosophy. These aims, indeed, can never be fully realized; for the inner life of individual states as of individual human beings, is an inscrutable mystery. Still, even in the external aspect of nations, there are many features besides their forms of government; and in estimating the actual state of any particular community, its ethnological origin, its language, its civilization, the spirit of its laws, above all, the character of its religion, all the elements, in short, which constitute its identity, are to be viewed as so many agents co-operating with, and in a great degree modifying, the influence of its constitution. Institutions, it has been said, do not decide all in the life of nations; that is, they are neither the sole cause nor the sole index of national well-being, which depends on many other conditions, and, like beauty, results less from the absolute excellence of its component parts than from their harmonious combination....
