The central fringe is formed at those points in arriving at which the two pencils have traversed equal paths; and as its position is therefore independent of the length of a wave, the rays of all colours will be united there, and the fringe itself will be white, or colourless. Such is the fact, as described by Fresnel himself, and by most observers who have repeated the experiment. Mr. Potter states, however, as the result of his observations, that the central fringe may be seen both black and white, although more frequently the former; and he urges the fact in opposition to the wave-theory. But it seems premature to draw any inference from such experiments, until the circumstances which have occasioned the variation in the results have been fully investigated and understood. The interference of the rays of light has, since the decisive experiment of Fresnel, been admitted on all hands; and the phenomena which were previously explained on the Newtonian hypothesis of the fits of easy reflexion and transmission, are now, by most of the advocates of the Newtonian theory, referred to this simpler and more fertile principle. This principle is, it has been stated, an immediate and necessary consequence of the wave-theory, and its experimental establishment must be - Phil. Mag., (3rd Series, ) vol. ii. p....
