The basic premise: An industrial and consumer environment built upon ubiquitous connectivity, affordable and sophisticated computing, virtually unlimited data storage, and category convergences driven by the resulting information flows, will necessarily feature a different set of qualities (at every level) from those to which we had become accustomed in bygone times. The fourteen chapters of this book isolate different aspects of the environment described - such as Fundamentals, Methods, Cycles, Leverage, Diffusion, Concentration, and others - presenting them with an emphasis on finance, strategy, markets, valuation, and general economic issues impacting enterprise and individuals alike. Dan Ramsden has been professionally active in institutional capital markets and investment banking for more than twenty years. In the past decade his focus has turned exclusively to the digital sectors and their innovations, some early impressions of which are collected in a previous publication, The Age of Convergence. The authors experience has taught him certain fundamental precepts, one of which is this: Everything changes, many things relate, and some things repeat. Knowing which of these things is which is the ongoing challenge in technology, commerce, and finance, which are all connected. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
