Excerpt from Mathematical Teaching: And Its Modern Methods The history of mathematical teaching in this country is yet to be written. It is necessary to pay some attention to this history in writing upon the theory; as the traditions of the elders have a great influence, partly good and partly injurious. If we find that a tradition in mathematical teaching arose from definite reasons still in force, we must be cautious about rejecting it as useless; but such are not all the methods which have been handed down. A few salient points of history may be useful to consider. About 1730 the Hollis professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy was founded at Harvard College; it goes back near enough to Newtons time to enable us to see the impulse which caused its establishment. Again, the successors of Winthrop, the first Hollis professor, taught by English methods and essentially English books, including Playfairs Euclid, till long after the Revolution. Webbers Mathematics, compiled from Hutton and the other English writers, and Huttons own books, were the standard for many years. It was the military experience of the Revolution which led to the employment of French and Swiss professors in West Point Academy; and its reorganization under Thayer, shortly after the War of 1812, led to the production by Davies, Church, and Bartlett, of a series of text-books compiled from Lacroix, Legendre, and other writers of the same nation.
