Excerpt: . ulator, whether he be a member of an exchange or a customer of a member, rarely ever intends actually to make or receive delivery; not because the obligation to do so does not exist, but because he knows how to avoid actual delivery by doing things which are theoretically equivalent to it. As between the member of an exchange and his customer, they settle by payment of the differences between the prices of purchases and sales; and, as between the buyer and seller on the exchange, whether one or both are dealing for themselves or for a customer, they expect to, and in fact do, settle with each other the great majority of the contracts made by payment of differences in prices by means of direct settlements, ring settlements or clearing house settlements. We cannot now discuss these methods of doing business; but...
