She feels that Leonidas still lives, and that he is fighting for freedom s echo to move deeper into the future. She feels him being submerged by history s tide, which takes him far. The Spartan king feels himself drifting into the abyss. But then he feels the will to live, to live freedom and let freedom live. He wills the tide to move from formlessness to form. Freedom or death. There is no other choice. Leonidas breathes in this freedom as the tide moves forward. Seconds pass while history marches on. The king opens his eyes faintly in the tide s rolling shadows. He hears voices emerging from the tide. The voices become one. They merge with the freedom that the tide embodies. He meanders through the depths, reaching for the shore. Tyranny obscures the light shining on the tide. The voices are drowned out by silence, but then the voices merge again and become one. The warrior feels the voice echoing deep inside the tide, and he knows that he must fight for that voice. A bloodied silhouette treads upon silence. The sun shines against its dark frame, and light passes through the bright, fleeting wound on its shoulder. Its light briefly illuminates the figure s upper body. Light falls from the shadowy man s face. Small rivulets of sunlight appear near the man s eyes. But the light seems adverse to the indifferent shape it falls upon. It drifts right through the darkened man s bleeding gaze, which takes in the light but then lets it stream out aimlessly into...
