A judge in settling interrogatories annexed to a commission has some power to determine what interrogatories may be annexed and their form. 9 Abb. Pr. 178. He can not deny or curtail the right of either party to insert any question pertinent to the issue which he proposes. He has authority to disallow questions not pertinent to the issue, and hence to determine whether a proposed question is pertinent or not; this power should be sparingly exercised, as he can not always foresee precisely what evidence the exigencies of the trial may render proper, and as the statute reserves to either party the right to make at the trial any objection to questions or answers which he could make if the witnesses were testifying orally. The phrase in the Code pertinent to the issue (892), and the phrase in the Revised Statutes pertinent to the cause (2 R. S. , 391), have the same meaning. A judge in settling interrogatories has not the same discretion as a judge at a trial, as to the extent he will permit a cross-examination for the purpose merely of testing the credit of a witness, and upon matters collateral to the main issue on trial he must insert all pertinent questions, although a judge sitting at the Vol. 9. --No....
