Excerpt: . . . the dust has settled we are sure both sides will be bound to recognize that it was indifference defeated the League. Not a selfish indifference, a deliberate determination to live on in our highly profitable isolation, but the indifference which derives from unsureness. It is not that the nation disapproved this new internationalism and decisively rejected it--even those of us who have counted most on American opinion to avert the danger can hardly claim this. America voted no on the new internationalism because she has just discovered she has not yet any certain knowledge of nationalism. It is not through any official blundering or diplomatic shortcomings of her own that America has come to realize how unlettered she is in the science of political systems. In the past five years we have been forced to watch Europe, England particularly, and compare her ways with ours. The course of the League of Nations effort itself set us pondering. Englands attitude to the League mystified us. Presented with this vague document, we straightway set to work to block up the loopholes where misunderstandings might creep in. We have insisted all be reduced to writing, clear beyond any misinterpretation. Why has England, whose colonial empire is threatened by the Leagues language far more directly than was our Monroe doctrine, accepted the covenant without ten minutes debate It is superficial to say the difference lies in the fact that we are accustomed to a written Constitution; it goes...
